If A Drug Addict Seeks Help, Can He Be Arrested?

By Louisville Addiction Treatment Center

There's nothing more important and powerful than someone suffering from addiction admitting that they need help. This is always the first step on the journey towards tackling the problem and learning methods to resolve it. While recovery is never linear, and far from easy, it can certainly be achieved with the right support and perspective.

While some people present themselves as exempt from this rule for a while, drug addiction is rarely a minor obstacle in an otherwise functional lifestyle. Sooner or later, such a dependence bleeds into the rest of our living situation. Most often, it will limit our productivity, shred our financial health, and surround us with negative influences.

It's not uncommon for drug addicts to become reprimanded by law enforcement. But when you're hoping to make that change towards your drug addiction, it may seem as though this process can only delay your ability to get help. But is that true?

If a drug addict seeks help, can he be arrested? Let's consider this topic below:

Do you have any pending warrants?

Of course, the answer to this topical question will entirely depend on what kind of warrants you have, or if the police wish to speak to you about anything.

If you have no specific charges brought against you, then the police won't arrest you simply for the crime of being a drug addict – that is unless you are caught using, caught with possession, or perhaps arrested for a related crime like driving under the influence.

While rehabilitation centers are a haven for addicts to become ex-addicts, neither they or their guests are immune to the law. If you are wanted for a crime, then it's important to turn yourself in as quickly as possible and make your dependency known so you can receive help for it. From here, law enforcement is required to help you receive the help you need while their legal processing continues.

It's also important to note that rehabilitation services are legally bound to report any illegal behavior taking place on their premises or as part of their program.

Aside from that, rehabilitation clinics are fundamentally aware of the hardship that drug addiction can bring to someone's life, and so will do all they can to help you actively engage with their program.

Utilizing essential rehabilitation services.

Rehab can be one of the best places for getting your life back in control without dependence on a certain substance.

The Louisville Addiction Treatment Center with the Impact Outpatient Program has a storied history of helping addicts become clean, learning strategies for coping with sobriety, and moreover, helping to restructure lives so that using never becomes a priority again.

From an easy and friendly admissions process to providing worthwhile intensive outpatient and telemedicine priorities – what matters is taking the initiative to engage with services that can actively improve your life.

Drug addiction may be part of your past, but it doesn't have to be who you are. Contact us to start on the most worthwhile of new journeys.
